This is a book that will not only verify what we knew all along and will also no doubt bring up points worth considering in connection to the 'race' debate. It doesn't matter where we come from, what color our skin is, the truth is we'll find good people in every place – and in those places not so good.

That goes for intelligence too. There will be those that are brilliant and those not so brilliant. And there are many areas in the world that has had devastating effects on many different people groups. There the details on the origins of racism and also the stomach turning examples of times in the past where racism was practiced with eugenics. One must stay above the text and realize the author is pointing out the ills of racism. A random opening of the book by an unsuspecting reader may lead to an erroneous conclusion.

In today's world this book is another of those 'must read' books. There is much insight to be gained and will bring to light much of the racist thoughts still going on in much of the media of today. For example, why would someone think a person's political thought and moral values are driven by their skin color? Shouldn't they be judged by the character they have, the moral values they hold, and the actions they perform? Oh yes, we have heard that before, back in the 60's... But that is still not the standard held to. And when it comes down to the details, nothing beats the culture that has Christianity as its core values. It leads to a much more open society and a much better economic atmosphere.

In the book, after the origins are considered and many of the racist outcomes are exposed, the author goes into the biology and into cultures. He is not afraid to point out that we are living in a fallen world where genetics does come into play. So the different people groups can and do have degraded systems that have problems. We are all created to have equal worth but we are not equal in many of our abilities. Each people group has people that are talented in ways our Creator has chosen them to be. So some are good at math, and others are better athletics with lots of variations on talents.

There is no one people group more genetically advanced than another. No group that is genetically behind all of the others. To me, this speaks strongly against evolution. Charles Darwin was wrong. Carl Weiland - the author - brings out an important summary. "...forget what you think you know from evolutionary conditioning – there is absolutely no scientific justification for the belief that someone is inferior or is to be treated differently because of belonging to people group A instead of B."

The book ends with a good discussion of economics and systems of government in relation to religion and culture. Atheism is shown to be an answer that has no future. It is only in our Creator that we can place our hope into. So there is the strong connection to the methodology that needs to be used to reach out to the people today. Many will find in it a new freedom never before realized. Again, a fine read.
